ACCIDENT AT NORTH POLE, CHILDREN NEEDED TO SAVE SANTA

NORTH POLE - North Pole News Station (N.O.E.L.) reports an accident at Santa's Workshop early this morning where "thankful" magic, the only magic known to power Santa's sleigh, has trapped Santa in a magic picture frame. No immediate casualties have been reported though one elf has checked-in to the North Pole General for observation. Children are asked to fill out a digital wishlist and send thankful wishes to Santa online at www.tatrotoy.com/giveback.

An early source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said overnight Santa's elves were adding thankful magic to power his sleigh for test runs when the spell backfired and rippled through Santa's Workshop trapping Santa in a magic picture frame by mistake. As the magic flew across the workshop it lifted 3 french hens, 2 turtle doves, and a partridge in a pear tree into the air. The magic also took out a licorice bridge on Candy Cane Lane.

Mintergy has reported power outages for over 1200 elves in the Frosted Hills section, a suburb of the North Pole, and hope to have it restored in the next 24 hours.

We reached out to a spokesperson at Santa Enterprises, the parent company of Santa's Workshop, for a comment on the situation and heard back within the last hour confirming the event saying that Santa will not be able to visit children on Christmas Eve unless they can help regenerate the thankful magic needed to set him free and power his sleigh. The spokesperson emphasized, "only children can generate the thankful magic to set Santa free and make sure his sleigh can make the trip this year". Children can help by visiting www.tatrotoy.com/giveback to send "thankful" wishes to Santa and visit him in person on December 12, 2020 in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Santa Enterprises hopes all the "thankful" magic will be restored in time for Christmas, but they're counting on the children to reverse that special magic.
